

Marilyn was my rock, and I couldn't have done it without her.

I started back at work part-time, but my confidence had taken a massive dive, and I no longer felt comfortable working with electricians.

"If I made a mistake it could cause a fire, or even kill someone," I told my boss and good friend, Wayne.

It was a heart-wrenching decision to leave the job I loved so much, but I felt I had no other option.

I spent the next six years as an operator in a dairy factory, and hated every moment.

If there's anything my accident taught me, it's that life is precious and you shouldn't waste a moment.

Because Marilyn worked in aged care, she saw a gap in the market for mobility scooters, wheelchairs and living aids.

We decided to combine our skills and open up our own shop and repair company in Stratford.

Mobility & More was opened in 2010, and I'm the happiest I've been since my accident.

I've renewed my electrical qualifications and am back to doing what I love the most: fixing things!

I love returning repaired mobility scooters and other electrical devices that people rely on so heavily - it's the best part of the job.

We're certainly not millionaires yet, but it's not about the money.

I now look at the wonderful life I'm living as a bonus and try to live each day to the fullest.
